CHRISTINA

Christina

Waitress

As a young woman living with a controlling boyfriend, I need a incognito app on my phone so that I can find resources that will help me secure some of my finances. I'm comfortable with using websites, but I need an app so it can be readily available and less traceable eliminating the worry of browser history.

● USER STORY PART 1

○ Christina researches websites in private mode while her boyfriend is at work. She's looking for tips on how to secure some of her money and how to keep her bank accounts secure.

○ On one of the websites she sees an ad for an app that would disguise itself as a hydration app, thus allowing her to have all of the information readily available.

○ She gets her phone and downloads it, with Touch ID access only she knows she's the only one that can access it, and it looks inconspicuous on the home screen. Without the Touch ID it will just open as a hydration app..

● USER STORY PART 2

○ When Christina is at work, she finds a moment to herself, opens the app — resting her finger on the home button she access the main content of the app. She taps on “What are the signs of abuse?” and reads the introduction — followed by tapping all the questions she feels applies to her situation.

○ By doing this, Christina realizes that the extent of abuse she’s in, is in fact much more extensive than she originally thought. The different areas he’s controlling.

○ Suddenly she she’s her boyfriend coming up to her — he’s checking up on her at work, as he often does. Christina quickly taps the top of the screen (always a red bar there) and she’s now in the hydration app. Her boyfriend only see’s that she’s entering an amount of water she’s had and doesn’t think any more of it. Later, Christina enters the app again — searches for shelters close to her work, and bookmarks a shelter she think looks good for her.
